Thanks for taking part in this study.

We are going to show you two policies that a university might have related to speech on campus, one after the other. These policies specify what can and can't be said.

For each policy, we will show you twenty cases of speech that has taken place in a university community. (These are all real examples, but taken from many different times and places.)

Your task is to decide whether the speech is permitted or prohibited under the policy.

Please note: we are not asking about your personal views on the speech itself — whether or not you like it or agree with it. We are also not asking whether you think the university's policy is a good one, or whether the speech should be permitted in an ideal world.

Your job is simply to apply the policy as written, like a referee applying the rules of a game. Set aside your own reactions to the speech and your views about the policy, and judge only whether the words in front of you fall within what the policy permits or prohibits.

If you find a particular example objectionable, that feeling is not relevant to the task — what matters is what the policy says. There are no right or wrong answers. We want your honest assessment of whether the speech is permitted or prohibited according to the rule.

The examples of speech used in this study have been paraphrased from a database of real campus speech controversies in the United States. Neither the cases nor the policies used in the study should be interpreted as reflecting the views of the researchers conducting this study, or their institution.

Before we start, one question:

*Which of the following best describes your political affiliation?

- Democrat
- Republican
- Independent
